How Much Do You Believe That What Happens to You Is the Result of Your Own Actions or Do Circumstances Beyond Your Control Largely Determine Your Fate? Locus of Control (LOC) is a phrase used by psychologists to describe a widely effective way of assessing an individual's potential for success--personal, social, and financial. Operating under a high external locus of control is generally not perceived as productive. People with an external locus of control blame others for their failures, yet attribute success to mere chance. They do not deeply analyze situations and typically blame others for their problems. This creates the inclination to refrain from action. External Control Personality Characteristics. Those with an external control also display a particular set of personality characteristics. Insecure--not confident in their own abilities and continually doubting they can accomplish difficult goals. Low self-esteem. It can be assessed by self-report questionnaires that measure our expectancies regarding the effects of our behavior. As mentioned in the Preface, if we perceive that luck, fate, chance, or powerful others determine outcomes, we are External.Â Put simply, Locus of Control is how we are dealing with various circumstances in our lives, do we take the ownership of the situations or are we governed by fate, luck, chance, or powerful others and hoping for the best. It measures comprehension between our actions and results. Interestingly enough, people who seize control over their lives tend to do much better overall. Locus of control is the degree to which people believe that they, as opposed to external forces (beyond their influence), have control over the outcome of events in their lives. The concept was developed by Julian B. Rotter in 1954, and has since become an aspect of personality psychology. A person's "locus" (plural "loci", Latin for "place" or "location") is conceptualized as internal (a belief that one can control one's own life) or external (a belief that life is controlled by outside factors which Locus of control is the extent you feel in control of the events that influence your life. Do you make things happen, or are you at the mercy of chance? Life is a game of chance. Individuals have little influence over the events of the world. If the statements above best reflect your view on life, then you probably tend to have an external locus of control.
