DISSERTATION

“Physical Verse: Matter and Form in English Poetry, 1400-1547.”

This dissertation considers shifting attitudes towards poetic form and content, or source matter, from the time of Chaucer to the time of Wyatt. Taking as its starting point the polysemy of the Middle English word “matere”—which denotes at once a writer’s source materials, his subject matter, and physical materiality in general—the dissertation argues that medieval poets prioritized and weighted the relation between matter and form differently than their early modern counterparts. Central to this difference is a shift in historical notions of poetic form, along with shifts in conceptions of materiality and literary technique. Differences in the aesthetics of poetry written in both periods are thus susceptible of historical explanation, and any assumed dominance of form over and above matter is revealed to be an historical construct rather than an aesthetic law. The dissertation includes chapters on the poetry of Thomas Hoccleve, John Lydgate, John Skelton, and Thomas Wyatt.
